The Education Commission of the States (ECS) Teaching Quality Policy Center produced this report for the Community Teachers Institute. Susie Bachler, researcher and Twanna LaTrice Hill, policy analyst prepared the report with the assistance of Michael Allen, program director and Charles Coble, executive director.

January, 2003
Introduction

The need for an insurgence of new teachers to counteract the effects of the teacher shortage is well-documented. Numerous articles, reports, and studies cite figures from the National Center for Education Statistics that two million new teachers will be needed by 2010 due to increased growth in the student population, the graying of the current teacher workforce and attrition of teachers. Some 29% of teachers leave the profession after their first three years, and 39% leave after five years. These reports and studies also highlight the fields and subject areas of greatest shortage – special education, bilingual education, mathematics and science. The situation is even more dire for hard-to-staff schools, particularly those in inner city urban and isolated rural. Nowhere, however, is the shortage more keenly felt than in the dearth of teachers of color in our nation’s classrooms. While 40% of students are of color, only 13% of teachers are. Some 40% of schools have no teachers of color on staff. The percentage of students of color in public schools is expected to increase; the percentage of teachers of color is not.

While there is some limited research that suggests educator diversity is of great benefit to all students, it certainly makes common sense. It is important for students of color to have role models they can look up to, role models who look like them, who have come from similar backgrounds, and who are important and influential in their lives. In an article published by The Record Online, Ana Maria Villegas, a professor at Montclair State University who has published reports and literature reviews about teachers of color, succinctly identifies one of the key reasons all students need teachers of color. She maintains:

“Teachers tend to be the one person and authority figure outside of the home that have a lot of influence on children. When they see only white people as teachers, that can reinforce the negative stereotype – in white students and students of color – that people of color are not capable of holding positions of authority. To students of color, it’s even more damaging because it sends a message they shouldn’t even bother.”

Teachers of color can also serve as cultural brokers, able to not only help students navigate their school environment and culture, but also to increase the involvement of their students’ parents. When there is a lack of teachers of color in a school, higher rates of absenteeism among students of color have been observed and more of them end up placed in special education. White students benefit from exposure to people of color in positions of authority and influence. This will better equip them to thrive in an increasingly diverse United States.

Many states have enacted policies to recruit teachers. This report, however, reviews only those state-funded policies which explicitly establish the recruitment of teachers of color as a goal. So, for example, while some 47 states have passed enabling legislation to create alternative routes to teacher certification, this report will address only those 3 states that specifically target the recruitment of teachers of color. A companion report entitled Recruiting Teachers of Color: A Program Review explores programs that exist to recruit teachers of color but that are not state funded.

Avenues Used by States to Recruit Teachers of Color

There are a variety of avenues through which states operate to recruit teachers of color. This section describes these avenues, which are also used to organize the table below. A following section provides a state-by-state overview of specific policies to recruit teachers of color.

Alternative Programs

Alternative programs are those in which teacher candidates are appointed as the teacher-of-record in a classroom after an initial training period of six months or less or are appointed as the teacher-of-record without initial training while enrolled in a collateral teacher preparation program. Alternatively trained teachers usually complete their preparation program while employed as teachers—often through an induction and mentoring program with additional coursework—and usually do not receive a standard beginning teaching credential until they have completed the preparation program.

Community Colleges

Community Colleges can be distinguished from 4-year institutions by the fact that they exist to serve the communities in which they are based. As a result, they have an open door admissions policy. They generally offer 2-year programs resulting in an associate’s degree, however, a few community colleges are permitted to offer 4-year teacher preparation programs leading to a bachelor’s degree. Community colleges already help prepare new teachers and some 20% of the current teacher workforce began their education in community colleges.

Early Outreach/Precollegiate Programs

Programs have been developed to expose students to teaching as a profession while they are still in middle and high school. These programs try to have an influence on a student’s career decisions before they enter college and communicate the message that teaching is a viable, important, and long-term career opportunity. Such programs also, in some instances, provide guidance and support to potential first generation college students.

Scholarships, Grants and Fellowships

Providing financial incentives is one of the most popular strategies to recruit teachers. Scholarships, grants and fellowships represent funding sources that pay for part or all of a student’s education. They generally do not have to be repaid, but recipients may be required to work in the state or designated school districts for a specified period of time as a condition of the award.

Loans/Loan Forgiveness

Several states offer loans to prospective teachers to help them defray the cost of their education. These funds generally have to be repaid and the interest rates on these loans vary widely. In some cases, loans are forgiven if the recipient teaches for a specific period of time in the state or in designated schools or school districts.

Paraeducators

Paraeducators (often referred to as paraprofessionals or teachers’ aides) are school employees who assist in the classroom and perform both administrative and instructional services under the supervision of the teacher. Programs have been developed to help paraeducators become fully licensed teachers.

Recruitment Program

Recruitment programs are designed to attract individuals who may not have considered a career in teaching. They target a variety of populations including precollegiate students, college graduates, and career changers.

Teacher Preparation Programs/Institutions

- Grants Awarded to Institutions: In some cases, states have awarded funds to institutions of higher education and teacher preparation programs to support their teacher recruitment efforts.

- Program Approval Requirements: In order to receive state approval for their teacher preparation programs, institutions are often required to explicitly articulate their teacher recruitment efforts.

- Preparation Partnerships or Consortiums: States use grants and other incentives to encourage institutions of higher education and teacher preparation programs to establish collaborative efforts among state agencies, school districts or schools. An example would be policies that call for joint efforts at teacher recruitment and continued assistance by districts or schools (e.g. by providing mentors, advising and assistance with licensure tests).

- Preparation for Teacher Licensure Assessments: More and more states are holding teacher preparation programs accountable for the performance of their graduates on assessments required for certification. Many teacher preparation programs provide coaching and remediation services to prepare their students for these assessments.
• Recruitment Plans: Teacher preparation programs are generally required to develop plans detailing their teacher recruitment efforts.

Other Relevant Areas

• Centers/Institutes: Centers or "institutes" as they are called in some states provide a variety of services to schools, school districts and even colleges of education. Such assistance may include, but is not limited to:
  o Assisting in formulating minority recruitment plans that are required by state policy.
  o Coordinating support services among various state agencies (e.g., local educational agencies, institutions of higher education including community colleges).
  o Hosting workshops or conferences relative to the issues surrounding minority teacher recruitment.

• Reports/Data: Many states require governing entities to collect data on teacher demographics; some states require this information to be published in formal reports.

• District Recruitment Plans: Some states require school districts or educational governing bodies to develop and, in some cases, implement plans to recruit teachers from underrepresented populations.

• Administrator Recruitment: It has been maintained that the performance of schools can often be tied directly to the effectiveness of the school’s leadership. Some states have begun to focus their recruitment efforts on identifying, training, hiring, and placing high quality, effective administrators in their schools.

• Grants to School Districts: School districts are able to use state grants to enhance their teacher recruitment efforts.

• Governance: In some states, the governing body of state educational agencies are charged with the responsibility for coordinating the teacher recruitment efforts in the state.
